After all, you have the walled garden of OS X, where you cannot install anything not from the Mac App Store, and that is maybe the reason why many feel that a UNIX OS is just a toy for hardcore Mac-users and not for everyone else. And besides that, there are other reasons not to just use OS X directly. Many people fear that switching from Windows to Mac might be a mission and feel that the learning curve would be too high. If you cannot manage to install a popular software you are not able to use. I've been using OS X directly since years, also used Windows as the primary operating system, and now I use Linux on the server side and Windows on the client side. I have been using Ubuntu as my primary OS for a few months now, but I was getting a bit tired of using Unity as I have got used to GNOME Shell and I wanted to give Cinnamon a chance. There are so many amazing programs out there. I could have installed a lot of those in OS X from the beginning, but I wanted to be able to install them directly from Ubuntu (via a repository), and so far it is working like a charm! (as you can see from my software lists). I have used VirtualBox for years and it is simply amazing. Every time I used it, it is getting better and better. This time I even installed the Windows OS directly in VirtualBox, but I don't think I will do it again as it is too much effort. And what about all those programs that require the use of the Mac App Store and that you cannot install in Ubuntu? Well, so far I have been able to do it. I installed Adobe Creative Suite 5.5 82157476af
